One of the most common theories about the assassination is that it was a conspiracy involving multiple shooters. This theory has been fueled by the fact that there are several inconsistencies in the official account of the events leading up to and surrounding the assassination.

One of the most significant inconsistencies is the fact that there is no clear evidence that Oswald fired the shots that killed Kennedy. The only evidence against Oswald is the testimony of witnesses who saw him holding a rifle at the time of the shooting. However, these witnesses were not all in agreement about what they saw, and some of them have since recanted their testimony.

Another inconsistency is the fact that the official investigation concluded that Oswald acted alone, even though there is evidence that he had accomplices. For example, there is evidence that Oswald was in contact with several people in the days leading up to the assassination, and that these people may have helped him plan the attack.

The Warren Commission, which investigated the assassination, concluded that Oswald acted alone. However, many people believe that the commission's findings were flawed. The commission was under pressure from the government to produce a report that would exonerate the government of any wrongdoing, and it is possible that the commission overlooked or ignored evidence that could have pointed to the involvement of other people.

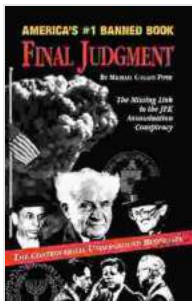

The assassination of President John F. Kennedy was a tragedy that has left many unanswered questions. While the official investigation concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone, there is evidence that suggests that there may have been more to the story. The missing link in the JFK assassination conspiracy may never be found, but it is important to continue to investigate the assassination in order to get as close to the truth as possible.
